Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Medicine a Science, or Disease an Unit If Medicine is not destined to forever halt in the domain of Empiricism, - if it is capable of becoming a Science - then there must be a common condition lying at the bottom of all special diseases, - then all pathological phenomena must acknowledge a common cause. This, and this alone, can constitute medicine a Science; this, and this alone, constitutes Astronomy a science. The efforts of Newton were not directed to the discovery of original individual facts, but rather to the discovery of the connecting links which should serve to bind together the individual facts and minor generalizations attained by his predecessors, into one great Whole. In attempting to accomplish for Medicine, what Newton accomplished for what is called Physical Science, we may seem to attempt the unattainable; but believing that there is nothing in the nature of our subject which forbids a reasonable expectation of its accomplishment, - believing that the individual facts and minor generalizations are abundant and ready, and that the advanced Medical Mind is now prepared to receive and appreciate their connection, we boldly encounter the task; resting all upon the validity of our arguments, hoping for nothing which cannot stand the test of the severest logical criticism. That there is nothing in the present state of Medicine which forbids the conclusion that our object is attainable, may be seen in the fact, that Astronomy and all that are now called exact sciences, were once in a state of Empiricism - once occupied the same ground, that medicine now occupies, - once encountered the same difficulty, - the Cause of physical phenomena...
