

Liquid crystal (LC), being fourth state of the matter, are exceptionally well-designed soft materials that include both direction and flexibility on a molecular and macroscopic layer. Recently, thermotropic liquid crystals have gained significant commercial interest in role in temperature sensors, electro-optic displays, and semiconducting logic devices, field effect transistors, light emitting diodes, photovoltaic cells and photo-recording devices. LC is now playing tremendous contribution in material science with its applications in liquid crystal displays (LCDs). Calix[4]arene gives an ideal platform with unlimited freedom in regioselective and stereoselective derivatization with easy modification at the upper rim and lower rim by means of non-covalent interaction, intermolecular forces and hydrogen bonding.

Dr. Pinkeshkumar G Sutariya has done his Ph.D at Department of Chemistry, Gujarat University. At present he is working as an Associate Professor at Bhavas Science College, Dakar, Gujarat University. His research interests are in the field of Supramolecular Chemistry, liquid Crystals and Fluorescence Sensors.
